

To Who it Concerns,

I was a student in Stevenson College in 1988. Our core course was three quarters long. I think it was a wonderful experience both academically and as a social situation facilitating meeting other Stevenson students. We read so many of the canons of the academic establishment and engaged in many heated discussions. It was for many of us the first time we were learning to think, speak and write in such a detailed critical, analytical fashion. In my case it certainly enriched my freshman experience and satisfied many of my general education requirements at the same time. It was the backbone of our Stevenson community and I think it would be a real shame to lose it. Additionally as an adult it has been great experience to be one of the most well read people in any company, this includes Ivy League alums and European educated peers.

Sincerely,

Maria Quintanar
